KHORASAN.

"It is not surprising that Khorasan, the wild east of Persia, should be effected by banditry because, remote as it is from the western front, the world war pro-foundly disturbed its peculiar govern-ment and social system," says a bulletin from the National Geographic Society concerning dispatches telling of the surrender of Khorasan insurrectionists and the death of their outlaw leader.

"Khorasan is world famous among connoisseurs of rugs, carpets and silks; beyond that fact to many it is but a name. Yet this least known of Persia's five great provinces suffered from the alliance of Great Britain and Russia, it sustained a severe shock when Russia fell under Soylet way, and it experienced me of the most crass forms of German intrigue.

"Through a long distance political lens
the statesmanship of the governors of Kaln, Khorasan sub-province and making center, commands high admir-ation. Their succession was hereditary, but their line held sway neither by right of blood nor ancient tribal choice. They ruled by force of leadership. First of all they had to please a populace many of whom were not more than a generation or two removed from nomandism They had not only to be ward politicians but international diplomats. Their problem was to play Russia, which reached Turkestan, against Great Britain, whose influence touched their eastern boundary through Arghanistan. And even before 1914 the insidious activities of Germany had to be taken into account. In addi-tion an eye had to be kept on Tehe-

ing the world war. Amir Shoukat ul Mulk was deposed, and his successor rode into Birjand, kissing the Koran, suspended across the roadway at the gates of the ciw. and thousands of his followers did likewise. The occidental observer might be particularly impressed with the hygiene of that ceremony, and he usually is distraught when when he finds that etiquette demands he accept from a host a cigarette which that host has lighted in his own mouth. If a number of guests are present hoat is likely to insert one for guest, applying one light to all and get-ting all started with one prodigious puff. Annoying to the other extreme, however, is the meticulous care of the servant who always must stop to cleanse his hands before answering the summons of his employer.

"Birjand lay on the main trade route of the camel and mule borne commerce between itussia and India. Before Russia broke down economically thousands of tons of wool were sent there from Khorasan, along with shawls and rugs and much of this ultimately Marseilles. The animal transports brought from India yarn and dyes, raw material for carpet making, and also coffee, tea and spices. Both the disturbances in Inl dia and the chaog of Russia have hampered Khorusan.

But the deeper significance is egosism.

You'll always find the person who shades his writing in this fashion is not at all averse to basking in the glare of the limelight and, also you may be sure that he or she has many other affectations. You must be careful. Such a person's opinions and statements should not be taken too readily at their face value.

CHILD TRAINING AT HOME

"Birjand, now capital of the sub-prevince of Kain is one of the chief carpet and rug making centers of all Persia. It has only about 15,000 people, but all about Birjand proper are little villages where men till the soil with the aid of oxen and women weave. The best of the Kain carpets are produced at Darakhsh, about fifty miles northeast of Birjand. A woman of this region who cannot weave becomes an economic lisbility. This condition, and the use of opium, are held responsible for the conderable number of beggar women to be seen at Birjand."
